Norfolk was still in the Tower, and in January, surrounded with gloom though she was, Marys letters to him shewed that she was still buoyed up with hope. Subscribing herself, your own, faithful to death, Queen of Scots, my Norfo, she said, I wrote to you before, to know your pleasure, if I should seek to make any enterprise; if it please you, I care not for my danger; but I would wish you seek to do the like, for if you and I should escape both, we shiould find friends enough, and for your lands, I hope they should not be lost, for being free and honourably bound together, you might make such good oflers for the countries, and the Queen of England, as they should not refuse. Our fault were not shameful; you have promised to be mine, and I yours; I believe the Queen of England and country should like of it. Letters between the two were frequent, she writing to him in cipher, which Higford one of his private secretaries deciphered and transcribed for the Duke. We learn that several of Marys letters were smuggled into the Tower in ale bottles, the corks of which were marked, and that Norfolks answers were returned the same way. During this year Marys hopes were clouded, not only by the imprisonment of Norfolk, but also by the murder of her half. brother, the Regent Murray, in the streets of Linlithgow, as narrated in...
